ACTIVITY 19: Studying circulation in the tail of a goldfish Introduction: In 1628, William Harvey published his finding on the circulation of blood without actually observing the blood capillaries. He hypothesized their existence based on the knowledge that the human circulatory system was a closed one, and some sort of vessel magnification showing the correctly labeled parts of the fish tail. However, your best guide for learning the logistics of this lab is to place the goldfish in the Petri dish and directly observe the blood coursing through the vessels of the tail using your own microscope. If necessary Parts I and II may be completed on separate days.
